Fish-Culture and Its Relation to an Improved System of Agriculture. Editors of the Dispatch: In your issue of the 3d instant I notice a communication from Colonel McDonald, Fish Commissioner of the State, and your editorial remarks in connection therewith.

The establishment of a commission to guard such an important public interest is a wise measure of State policy, as is every measure calculated to develop, foster, and protect all the material interests which affect the happiness and prosperity of the people of the Commonwealth.

I am induced to offer a few thoughts on the subject which heads this article, in order to show that there are physical causes now operating against a successful effort to restock with fish our inland streams; and if wise action be had there should be no waste of money and labor in such an effort until these causes have been in part or Horses for the FIRE DEPARTMENT OF wholly removed.

It will take time to remove the obstacles if they be such as I apprehend they are; but we may have a reasonable hope that the physical surface of our lands will not long remain as it is, and that an enlightened system of agriculture will clothe with grass the abrased surfaces which now furnish abundant material for the pollution of streams, affecting the health and life of the valuable class of fish which demand pure and limpid water. It may be a novel idea that deprayed agriculture is so universal in its deleterious effects as to reach even the fish in the waters which flow through the lands, as well as the cattle in the fields, the comforts of the bomestead, and the wealth of the State.

The fishing interests of the Commonwealth may be named under three heads: 1. Proper protecting and prohibitory laws to guard the property interests of the State and its citizens in respect to the oyster-beds and fishing shores of Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries.

2. The restocking of inland streams of sufficient purity to justify it. 3. The revenue which should be derived by the State by a tax on oysters and other fish where its proprietary rights will authorize it.

All these questions should come under the supervision of the Fish Commissioner. but I propose only to offer a few thoughts in respect to the second.

In the large midland district which lies between salt water on the east, the foot of the mountains on the west, the Potomac river on the north, and the North Carolina line on the south, there are numerous streams which once abounded with fish, but from all of them the best varieties have disappeared, except for short distances between the junction of the fresh water of these streams with the salt water of the bays and inlets into which they empty. Take, for instance, the James, flowing through the middle of this district, as to which I quote your own forcible words: "This noble stream is the main artery proceeding from the very heart of Virginia. All of its blessings enure to the good of a vast community. In early days the comfort and subsistence that came from the supply of fish in James river were dispensed to the right and to the left, to all people, from Hampton Roads to the foot of the Alleghany Mountains. In modern days, owing to dams and mills in part, but chiefly to those of the James-River canal, the fishes have been denied the right of way, and those from salt water which once sported in the riffles of Jackson's river as high as the green meadows of Bath are seen no more above Maiden's-Adventure dam." The causes here assigned for the disappearance of fish in the upper waters of the James are to some extent true, but there are others of a more potent character. Not many years ago there was a good fishing shore just below Mayo's Island, on the Manchester side, where shad, rock, herring, and perch were profitably taken by the baul-seine; but this cannot be done now. So at Watkins's, near Warwick, five miles below the falls, and at Cox's and will show that the schools of fishes might pass to the upper waters of the James but for the obstructing dams; but they have been cut off through some cause even below these obstructions. The reason for this is very plain. Richmond, being now a city of about 80,000 inhabitants, furnishes polluting matter enough from sewers, gas-works, saw-mills, and factories, to render the water for many miles below obnoxious to fish. And in this connection I may mention that I have recently read in the "Eighth Annual Report of the State Board of Health" of Massachusetts a very interesting article on stream-pollution; and whilst its statements are chiefly confined truth, there are now no good fishing shores between Richmond and City Point. This to the medical aspect as affecting the health of the people, it has not overlooked the effects of such pollution on the fish, which once abounded in the principal streams of the State-such as the Nashua, Merrimac, and Sadbury. The towns and their factories which have grown up on these rivers have, by their polluting substances, driven off the best food-fishes, which require pure water for their subsistence. Coming back to the physical condition of

point that its pollution assumes an agricultural aspect, and can only be removed by improved agriculture along its borders and the borders of its main tributaries. The abrased lands on its impending hills, until it reaches the rocks and forests of the mountains, are sufficient to furnish much polluting mud; and these are greatly added to along its principal tributaries—such, for instance, as the Rivanna, which flows through the red lands of Albemarle and Fluvanna. This stream alone brings, after every rain, its tribute of mud, which has made it a byword in Richmond when the hydrants furnish a cider-colored liquid for drinking and domestic uses. The time was, doubtless, when the forests were uncleared, that even this stream abounded in the best varieties of fish; but its muddy and turbid waters are now mainly inhabited by catfish and eels, and I much question whether even these are well sustained in life. Another stream I may mention in this midland district-the Nottoway river-about which I know more, having been born on its shores, and as to which my memory can run back for fifty years or more. When a boy I could go out with my book and line, between meals, and bring back to my mother a full supply of the nicest pan-fish; but now, and for years past, where my best fishing sports were enjoyed in my youth nothing can be found and is in no condition for a decent fish to What is true as to the three streams named may be safely taken as true in respect to all the streams in the midland district of the State, and the pollution which renders them uninhabitable by fish of desirable kinds can only be removed by improved agriculture. The forests which once furnished shade and gave purity to the waters by holding back surface-washings have yielded their benefits to open and abrased fields, and these must now be made to hold back their mud and drift by grass deep tillage, and other resources of intelligent culture; or, otherwise, the most active efforts of a fish commissioner to restock the inland streams of the State will be abortive and a waste of time and money.
